WASHINGTON — New York City officials say they have steered black and Hispanic contractors away from public housing projects and have taken steps to integrate them more fully. The city, under a federal desegregation order, has until the next few days to show that it is not discriminating against black and Hispanic contractors.

The city is to show that it has not discriminated against more than 2,000 black and Hispanic contractors since 1989, when it can show that such discrimination ended, officials said yesterday.

The lawsuit, filed by more than 100 black and Hispanic contractors, charges that New York City violated the Civil Rights Act of 1968 by discriminating against certain public housing contractors by selecting tenancies for them based on race and ethnicity and by using projects to which they were assigned to refer them to other contractors.

The settlement could have a ripple effect in other cities.

If it's not fun, don't do it.

So the lines have been drawn and we all know which side we stand on, don't we? Unless we haven't been tested. Tested? What a lovely term. It's all about taking sides, isn't it? No matter what anyone tells you, you can see it everyday.

When the cdc decided to change its definition of aids to include people with t4 cell counts below 200, I questioned the psychological implications and was challenged, by members of the health care industry. But we all know the lines have been drawn anyway, don't we? You've got your negatives and you've got your positives standing on opposite sides of the junior high gymnasium. Add some asymptomatics and symptomatics. Pick a corner everybody. How about hiv and aids? "Living with" and "victims"? And my favorite line to draw, those with aids and those that have died. Aids and death. Don't worry, it's only a dodge ball game after all.

Fuck semantics.

It's ok to go to bed with someone as long as you don't talk about it. And fuck him for going to ACT-UP demos and then telling me he can't deal with it. But you're so brave, so incredibly brave. Yea, right. The fucking queer fucking hiv marines. That's what we are. Boy scouts with a bug talking so much we don't even care what we say anymore. Then my friends wonder why I write about inappropriate things and say things to my family that cause controversy. Fuck controversy. This is my reality.

Feelings. Nothing more than feelings. Trying to forget my, feelings of love.

there are no rules.
there is no structure.
there is only you.

Galactically Speaking...

by Alex Miller-Mignone

Boundaries. A Saturnian theme if ever there was one. Life consists of a successive series of boundaries, and perhaps the measure of a life is not so much how well we maintain our boundaries, as how far we extend them.

Earth-bound mortals while physically incarnated, we define ourselves by the boundary of our flesh, the ultimate housing of the me-ego versus the you-ego, a condition aptly described by Alan Watts as "egos encased in bags of skin." Politically we define ourselves by citizenship, often forgetting that the boundaries we see on our carefully drawn world maps do not exist on the planet's surface. Ecologically we are bounded by the earth's atmosphere; psychically we might define ourselves by the lunar orbit.

As inhabitants of Earth we are member units of the inner solar system, delimited by the asteroid belt, but we share an affinity with the middle system, Jupiter through Neptune, and the outer system, defined by Pluto's eccentrically declined orbit and beyond to Transpluto/Persephone and those bizarre galactic ambassadors, the comets. Beyond that is the Galactic Rim, then the prosaically named "Local Group" of galaxies, followed by the "Local Supercluster" and finally the Known Universe, whose boundaries, ever expanding, are currently an estimated fifteen to twenty billion light years away, give or take a billion.

Where in this dizzying complex of boundaries do we place ourselves?

In the late 1880's the Lakota Sioux shaman Black Elk experienced a vision of himself on the central mountain of the world, which for him was Harvey Peak, South Dakota; although, as he himself said, "the central mountain is everywhere." In his vision he saw himself surrounded by the sacred hoop of the Sioux nation, and about it all the other hoops of all the other nations, which somehow needed to be assimilated into one.

Modern science tells us that the Universe is isotropic; that is, it has no center, and would look the same no matter where in it you were, no matter which direction you looked.

Perhaps the healthiest response to this issue of boundaries is to acknowledge that we are in fact the very center of the Universe, but no more so than anyone or anywhere else. We are each the center, and there are no limits to the circumference of our being except those which we ourselves impose.

In the wake of the January 4, 1992 eclipse, when the Sun and Moon, Essence and Form, were conjunct within the orb of balsamic Uranus/Neptune, we can expect the continued shattering and dissolution of the boundaries shielding us from the knowledge of our truly limitless selves. As you redefine the bounds of your own sacred hoop, acknowledge and pay homage to your traditions, respect and honor the integrity of others, and make the effort to link your bounds with theirs. Remember, the only difference between "bounds" and "bonds" is "u."
